PREFACE

Origin. This dictionary is the first outcome of a desire on the part of the publishers to place on the market a series of somewhat uniform bilingual dictionaries in which the pronunciations of the words should be indicated, and a desire on my part to produce a system of dictionaries in which the like phenomena of all languages should be expressed by like symbols, classified by like terms, and treated in like manner. The present volume is the first of a series of general bilingual dictionaries, the next five of which are to be as follows: German-English and English-German, Latin-English and English-Latin, Spanish-English and English-Spanish, Greek-English and English-Greek, Italian-English and English-Italian.

Part of a System of Dictionaries. The dictionaries just mentioned are but a part of a proposed system of dictionaries which will include, along with other general bilingual dictionaries, such as Japanese-English and English-Japanese, Russian-English and English-Russian, Swedish-English and English-Swedish, French-German and German-French, German-Russian and Russian-German, Spanish-French and French-Spanish, a series of general unilingual dictionaries, as of English, French, German, Spanish, Italian, and other languages, as well as series of special dictionaries, both unilingual and bilingual, in English, and also in other languages, of each of the chief sciences, such as Mathematics, Chemistry, Astronomy, Biology; of the chief arts, such as Music, Medicine, Law, Finance; and of certain groups of proper names or other material, such as pertain to Geography, Biography, and other subjects. Each of these books may be enlarged or abridged in various degrees, as occasion warrants; and re-compiled and re-arranged in various ways, so as to be suited to the uses of different nationalities. As time goes on, and there arises a demand for more strictly phonetic dictionaries, each may be produced, also, in transfigured form, the title-words being printed and arranged phonetically and followed by the current spellings and by definitions in phonetic spelling.

For English-speaking People. The present volume is made primarily for the use of English-speaking people. Not only this preface, but all explanatory words and phrases throughout the book are, therefore, in English. I have purposely avoided the attempt, so commonly made, to make a book equally well fitted to either of two or more nationalities; and trust that I have thus avoided the common result: a book imperfectly fitted to any nationality.

Sources. In the compilation of this dictionary the more recent English dictionaries and French dictionaries have been used either as bases or for occasional reference. Constant use has been made of the Nouveau Larousse Illustré, as far as published. The bulk of the work on the definitions has been done by Frederic W. Mitchell, whose experience as a proofreader of English and French, and interest in things linguistic, render his services specially valuable in such work. Much of the work of defining the Proper Nouns has been done by E. H. Siegfriedt. Paul Passy and George Hempl, while revising the pronunciations, have, at my suggestion, here and there made a correction or suggestion in the definitions; but they are in nowise responsible for the definitions. Professor Passy has, however, revised the genders of the Proper Nouns. Professor Hempl has made various criticisms which have helped me in this Introduction. The difficulty of eradicating the complexities and errors of preceding dictionaries, of avoiding errors of one's own, and of securing uniform adherence to a new and simple style, will, I hope, be less apparent in the finished product than it has been in the process of making. I feel that the so-called finished book is really but a book just begun, a proper basis, that is, for a start rather than a perfected product.

Clearness, Simplicity and Brevity. Lexicography, as often carried on, consist largely in devising and publishing schemes for economizing space for the publisher and saving the time of the editor, at the expense of the time of the reader. The editorial passion for developing ideograms and systems of graphic abbreviations tends to sacrifice clearness to brevity. I, however, have sought to make brevity consistent with clearness and simplicity. This I have striven to accomplish by the concise use of the ordinary written form of the spoken language, which everybody understands. Only title-words are set in heavy-faced type, thus avoiding the confusion to the eye and mind commonly arising in the use of other dictionaries, either from lack of contrast, or from the heavy-faced type being profusely scattered over the page. The alphabetic order is strictly adhered to. The title-words are left in their ordinary form, not mutilated or cut into unrecognizable parts, or loaded with artificial or arbitrary accents, hyphens, and the like, devices that are employed in other dictionaries in order to save space, indicate pronunciation, or suggest distinctions, but which are certain to perplex, annoy, or retard the student by disguising the words, while they accomplish nothing that may not far better be accomplished by other means. The type and the typographic arrangement, the width of the column, the dimensions of the page, are all conducive to legibility, to the rapid scanning of the article, column, and page, and to the comfort of the eyes. The width of the page is such that when the dictionary is opened the pages will lie flat.

Vocabulary. Care has been exercised in selecting the words to be included and these will generally be found to be such as the reader is most likely to be looking for. It is no small task to accomplish this and I am fully aware that the vocabulary is far from perfect. A revision of the book at some future time will perhaps improve it in this as well as other respects. My aim, moreover, has been to treat clearly, simply, and accurately what is included, rather than to attempt to include everything.

Spellings. Spellings are determined, as nearly as may be, independently of pronunciations; that is, the form of a word given in title-place is based upon the frequency of its occurrence and the like, without respect to the way in which it is usually pronounced. A good many of the more common variant spellings are also given title-place, with reference to the form under which the definition appears.

Irregular Forms. The more characteristic irregular parts of every irregular verb are given in title-place, and, in the French, under infinitive, as well. Irregular adjective, nouns, and pronouns are similarly treated, especially in the French.

Definitions. The definitions are, in general, equivalents, not explanations, of the title-words. The only important exceptions to this are those words that designate things or institutions peculiar to one country or its people and consequently have no conventional designation in the language of the other country. No attempt has been made to use any specially devised scheme of typography and punctuation for the purpose of indicating or suggesting the scope or applicability of definitions. Roman and italic type, and the familiar comma, semicolon, period, dash, and parenthesis are made to serve as best they may their ordinary functions of dividing off the like from the unlike, and so on. In this respect, as in other respects, my desire has been to use a self-explanatory style, rather than a style which involves the reader in needless perplexity and in constant reference to an introduction and to a long table of abbreviations. The order of the definitions under any one title-word is that of most frequent use. When there is no choice, the older or more physical senses come first. Technical senses and slang come last.

Phrases. Phrases are usually given only when the idiom differs in the two languages, but occasionally a phrase is introduced merely as an example of the use of the word. Sometimes too, when a given title-word is used solely or chiefly in some special phrase or kind of phrase, or has no exact equivalent in the other language, no equivalent for the word is given, but only a phrase with its equivalent. The phrases under each title-word are not abbreviated, but are spelled out in full, thus being in their natural form, and hence more easily found, recognized, pronounced, visualized, and remembered. Regular plurals, imperative forms of verbs, and the like, requiring special definition, are treated as phrases are. If a word has a special or specific meaning when capitalized, the capitalized form is often given as a phrase would be under the lower-case title-word, but sometimes the reverse order has been followed, the capitalized form being given in title-place, and the lower-case form being given under it as a phrase would be.

Cross-references. Cross-references are usually reduced to the simple and non-committal form "see so-and-so," which serves ordinary purposes quite as well as would any system of cross-references aiming at the exact truth and nothing but the truth, unless such a system were quite elaborate. The part of speech of a title-word from which a cross-reference is made to some other title-word is usually indicated only when the pronunciation of the one title-word differs from the pronunciation of the other title-word.

Proper Nouns. A list of French Proper Nouns is given separately at the end of the French-English part, each title-word being followed by its pronunciation and English equivalent and sufficient explanatory matter to identify it. The list does not claim to be fuller or more satisfactory than the lists usually given in dictionaries of this kind, upon which, indeed, it is largely based. Little attempt has been made to include the names of prominent persons who have lived in modern times. The inclusion of any list of proper nouns in a dictionary of this scope is somewhat gratuitous, and it is my intention at a future time to meet specifically the existing demand for thoroughgoing dictionaries of proper nouns of various classes.

Pronunciation in General. For the most part, but one pronunciation of each title-word is indicated. Individual and local variants are very rarely given and, when given at all, are in separate title-place. Nor is any heed taken of the modifications which words undergo when used in types of discourse different from the normal type. On the other hand, considerable attention has been devoted to certain functional variants concomitant with changes of meaning or stress, variants which each individual uses according as he uses a word with this or that meaning, in this or that manner or position, or with this or that degree or position of stress. This I believe to be an important innovation in lexicography. The idea has been carried out more thoroughly in the English than in the French. The pronunciation is indicated by full re-spelling. The phonetic alphabet employed for this purpose is an amplified form of the Roman alphabet that has been undergoing a remarkable development in recent years and is here further amplified and modified to more perfectly meet the requirements, especially in the English. This alphabet is, in the main, that of the International Phonetic Association, of which Professor Passy has always been the leading spirit. It is by far the most diversely used and highly perfected means as yet developed for indicating, simply and accurately, the pronunciation of all languages in any single system at all likely to come into world-wide popular use under the conditions as they actually are. It will doubtless undergo further modification of detail as time goes on, but the principles which have guided the selection of its elements, the flexibility of its framework, and the extent and manner of its present use, bespeak its capacity for development and foretell its universality. On the following page is a table which shows the more important symbols of this alphabet, arranged so as to give some idea of the place and manner of articulation of the sound or group of sounds which each of the symbols represents. Still further on is another table showing the alphabet as applied in this volume to English and French.

The differentiation in English of (g) as in go (goo) and (g) as in gig (gɪg); (k) as in car (kɔː) and (k) as in keep (kiip); sonant and surd (l) as in blade and play respectively; (j) as in ye (ji) and (ç) as in cure (kʊːz); sonant and surd (z) as in grate and crate respectively; and the differentiation of these last two sounds and the sonant and surd fricatives in dry and try respectively; and in French the differentiation of sonant and surd (n); (n) and (N); (m) and (M); (l) and (L); sonant and surd (r); (j) and (ç); (w) and (w); and sonant and surd (y) are not represented in this dictionary.

In the English, weak voiceless consonants have been classed as voiced or voiceless according as the preceding sound is voiced or voiceless, as in his (hɪz, rather than hɪs), edged (edʒd, rather than edʒt), but scratched (skrætʃt). Some of these, and perhaps other differences, may be more accurately represented in later editions of this book, as well as in other dictionaries of this series, especially, of course, in those dictionaries that deal with languages in which certain of these differentiations play a more obviously important rôle in the distinction of meanings than is the case in English, or in French.

Linking and Elision. In the French, words which begin with a vowel sound or with j, w, or y, and admit of preceding linking and elision, and words which begin with a consonant sound other than j, w, or y, and do not admit of preceding linking and elision, are considered regular, and are not noted, but words of the first kind which do not admit of preceding linking or elision, or in which the linking and elision are optional or variable, are considered irregular, and after the part of speech of each there is placed, in brackets, a statement of the facts. Linking-forms, although conspicuous and important in French, and interesting, though much less conspicuous, in English, are indicated very rarely even in the French. For the manner in which the phenomena of preceding linking and elision are indicated in the French, the responsibility rests wholly with me, not with Professor Passy.

Syllabic Division. Syllabic division is not indicated, either in the title-words or in their re-spellings, except as this is incidentally done by the stress-mark. In certain of the English re-spellings, as of gardener, in which a consonant forms a syllable by itself and is immediately followed by a vowel, or by w or j, or by another syllabic consonant, the syllabic division has been indicated, because, without such indication, the consonant might be understood, not as in itself constituting a syllable, but as being the first sound in the next syllable, and serious mispronunciation might result. In these cases the ordinary symbol of syllabic division, the hyphen, has been used, except where the syllabic division is already indicated by the presence of a stress-mark.

Duration. Extra length, or duration, of sounds, especially in the case of vowel sounds, is indicated by the length-mark (:) placed just after the letter representing the sound in question.

Nasality. Nasal quality in vowel sounds is indicated by the nasality-mark (̃) placed over the letter.

Stress. Primary stress only is indicated, and always by the simple stress-mark (') placed just before the stressed syllable. The stress indicated is, in general, the stress which the word has when isolated. In the English, certain systematic shiftings of the stress are indicated, notably in the case of words whose stress shifts according as these words are used predicatively or assumptively in a sentence, the predicate form being given first. But otherwise, although various phenomena of stress-shifting are exceedingly common in both English and French, no attempt is made to record them.

French Pronunciation. The pronunciation of French here given is that of the educated classes in and around Paris and, with some latitude, in the North of France, which although admitting of some local and individual varieties, may, for practical purposes, be considered uniform. Notwithstanding greater differences that exist in other parts of the country, it may also be looked upon as a fairly uniform standard to which the majority of educated people nearly everywhere tend, consciously or unconsciously, to approximate. For the non-recognition of the sound (h) as the initial sound in certain of the words that commonly allow of no preceding linking or elision, I am myself responsible, Professor Passy not being prepared to say whether this sound is or is not present in the usage of the greater number of persons of the classes and localities here taken as normal. In doing this, I have been guided by my general impressions, and by the statements of others, such as Rousselot. At my request, also, the indication of "half-long" vowels has been omitted.

English Pronunciation. The pronunciations of English are somewhat normalized or universalized forms of those current to-day in the English-speaking world at large. Where it was necessary to choose between the usage of Great Britain and that of America, the latter has been given. At my request, the natural pronunciation of words that are not distinctly bookish has been preferred to the orthographic or over-careful articulation. But in general, a conservative spirit has been maintained, and innovations that have not yet pervaded the larger part of the English-speaking territory and population, have been disregarded.

The vowel in class, after, etc., is not identified with that in father; (z) is retained in park, farther, etc.; the (t) and (d) of lunch (lantʃ), lounge (laundʒ), etc., are not dropped (as they now usually are in Great Britain), and, on the other hand, the (t) that is generally inserted in America in once (wants, wans), month (mantθ, manθ), etc., and the American breaking up of o into a, u, and i: are disregarded. Considering the great diversity of usage in the employment of the glottal stop (?), it is ignored in the phonetic transcription.

Where more than one pronunciation is given, the first is the full form, the one generally heard when the word is pronounced alone or at the end of a clause; after this are given reduced or otherwise modified forms concomitant with lack of stress or following heavy stress.

Abbreviations. Abbreviations are used only for the parts of speech, gender, and such-like universal and regularly occurring terms.

Gender. The gender of every French definition, whether the definition is a word or a group of words, is indicated, but when several such definitions of the same gender follow each other, whether separated by commas or by semicolons, the gender is indicated only once: after the last. French nouns of natural gender, when occurring in title-place in the French-English part, are followed by n. When they occur as definitions in the English-French part, they are, except when occurring alone, or initial, or final, followed by m., f., as the principle of non-repetition of genders makes it necessary in many cases that both of the genders of a medial definition of double gender be given. It is almost impossible to ascertain directly the gender of many of the French town-names, for the phrases in which the gender would be obvious are extremely rare. In many cases the gender is, no doubt, uncertain, but one may pretty safely guess, according to Professor Passy, that it is generally feminine (on account of ville), unless some masculine component is used, as, for example, in Port-Vendres, Pont-Audemer, Fort de France, Le Mans. The same is true of islands. Mountains are usually masculine, Mont or Pic being implied; but some are feminine. The gender of rivers is easiest to ascertain, yet many doubtful cases remain.

Etymologies. Etymologies are not indicated. It is assumed that the history of words, which, in a dictionary of this size, would have to be very much condensed and rather scantily treated, had better be altogether omitted. Should there be a demand for a larger dictionary having the special features of this one, the adequate treatment of this subject will there be possible and appropriate.
